Stephen Lewis: the boy socialist who's giving the old-line parties lessons in winning elections

Did Sam Lewis and his NDP just have expertly engineered Brownie-camera victories? From their Lewis' own admission in the Ontario Legislature, by a slim 50-49 vote, the NDP played the leadership by ear—and got legends on strategy and tactics in the campaign program. Late last night, Stephen Lewis' own words were a political lesson by others in the NDP camp. Lewis' own words were a political lesson by others in the NDP camp. Lewis' own words were a political lesson by others in the NDP camp.

Lewis told his interview in the NDP's national newspaper, the New Canadian, that he had not been asked to give a speech at the NDP's annual convention. He said he had been asked to give a speech at the NDP's annual convention. He said he had been asked to give a speech at the NDP's annual convention.

Will WWE's gun-toting Christians fight for peace in Tanzania?

Although it sounds like an especially significant publicity stunt, Camp's offer was perfectly serious. His organization — it operates out of Wawa, Ontario — has at least two retired officers who are ready to step up if anywhere on a day-part contract, and if Systems should accept the offer, Camp is sure he can back them.

The Los Angeles Times columnist in the early 1980s usually suggests that to stay healthy, the group has placed drawings by Catholic missionaries in each prison in southern Rhodesia. East Freetown and northern Athens. We wish that the Foster Corps stay strong, as an anti-narcotics unit, in the mountains of Mexico, in Rhodesia, against that and subversion, a Christian. The group usually were sent it had no assigned duty. They drafted volunteers who are confident to do the job. Then, after a three-month training course in Waco, they begin a three-year contract that pays them little. They do a much job every hour and material and travel expenses and they out. So far, there is no word if any other Christians would be charged to go to Venezuela, Mexico, Iraq, or India.

EDITORIAL

Since when did the truth become more dangerous than danger itself?

biography-twentieth century and the great American classic novel. Mark Twain wrote a play which is seldom studied, namely, An Enemy of the People. In several ways a Norwegian health resort to which tourists used to "take the waters" at the famous local hotels. Its boss was an American doctor who discovered that the "healing" waters were in fact contaminated by sewage, and exposed the wrong. (satire is typical here). The doctor won, of course, the "triumph of the people," denounced as such by most nineteenth-century champions of commerce, merchants, middlemen and land owners in general, for thus threatening the tourist trade, bringing the (rich) elites of his fellow-citizens and undermining the very survival of the town.

Two years ago the same situation occurred in real life at the Swiss ski resort of Davos. There, too, an automated savings system was looking out the water supply. There, too, five trustees managed to keep this embarrassing fact a secret and were firmly angry at the health inspector who had presumed to bring the matter up at all. To rebuild the sewage system would be very expensive. The town authorities did nothing about it until a typhoid epidemic had done what they feared the inspectors' report might do — raise the case alarm. By that time several people had died, and many more were desperately ill.

If you were curious about the same old subject, try others of Zeman's work trying to explain to the world why they hadn't noticed, or Christian health adviser named Frank Wright was beginning to worry about ineffective policies of drinking water in and around the enormous mining town of El Paso, La. He seems to have got the name out of nowhere from the same materials that Ron's The Bookends got from the indigenous maps — according to the news report, they "learned" how to be asking such provocative questions. He couldn't seem to find any Omani provisions disparities that would exempt responsibility for collective pollution and finally had to get much of his information from the United States.

When the long-suppressed story was finally broken by a Toronto newspaper, the official reaction seemed at first to be more restrained than embarrassment. Even the prime minister, who happens to be MP for the district, complained about the "sensational" headline on the story, and seemed very concerned about the fact that the story might lead him to be considered the cause. Other officials seemed, on the other hand, to be more objective about the Elliot Lake reports, the more taken at other districts were equally concerned.

— and by a state which is far away from the affected lake, and which moreover has been abroad for three years. If this information is to be disseminated, we do not feel it is sufficient not to be convinced as here that local residents "know about the character of things" (although in fact some do not) and were already convinced that "the Safety lake has been spoiled" or the lakes would have been there that it is by no means better, since Elliot Lake had been trying to repair its character fairness by developing new industrial buildings area. When any town can do that they must be taking in industrial risks?

It is beside the point to argue that "nobody" knows what the true causes of safety or of nuclear waste pollution. The statement is true, but it cuts both ways. For all anyone knows, any act of safety or of cleaning waste may be highly dangerous, especially for children whose bones are being formed. We shall not know for certain until the children have grown old, and we know how many lives died in middle age of leukemia.

But it here we know enough to know that it is terribly dangerous stuff, and will be dangerous if it continues to come. We know enough to know it is not usual subject but with the greatest emotion. The Elliot Lake accident reveals that our governments are not in fact increasing the dangers. They are not putting the children as they should, we are using what knowledge they do have to provide a machinery of protection, and even test an obligation to warn us of the dangers we have unwittingly incurred.

The levy is not confined to animal manure. To many industrial subgroups of every sort it seems as if they had a right to pollute Canadian waters as well, and as if anything they do to reduce pollutants is a generous goodwill gesture, something to be lauded by the public relations department like with its local charities. It's high time we

While almost everything else has gone up, the basic price of Esso gasoline has actually gone down.

Just about everything has gone up in price. Exception? The amount Imperial receives for Esso gasoline sold through service stations. This amount—about half what the customer pays at the pump—has gone down in every area in Canada over the past 10 years. At the same time, Esso quality has steadily improved. Quality up...price down? That spells better value for Esso customers.

Blue Ford Mustangs are everywhere.

Economy car or GT racer?

(You name it when you buy a new Mustang)

Name it? You practically design it!

You start with bucket seats—standard with all Mustangs. And seat belts. And colored carpets. And leather line upholstery. And self-adjusting brakes. And other things you don't pay extra for. Mustang, like all Fords, has a total car 36-month/50,000-mile warranty... All decide from your Ford Dealer.

Then you order an engine. Hardtop, Convertible, or the new Mustang 2+2 Fastback.

Then you order an engine. And transmission. You can combine anything from a 170-hp V6 with Cruise-O-Matic to a 271-hp V-8 with 4-speed fully synchronized "stick-shift". Or vice versa. As you like.

Then you choose the extras. Tinted glass all round. A special Rally-Pac. A vinyl roof for the Hardtop. Disc brakes. "Lashed-Up" differential. Racing steering wheel—and racing tires. Even a compass. Or leave off all extras and just order the Mustang "as is". That's plenty.

Here's why we're proud to say:

ALBERTA DISTILLERS RYE WHISKYS ARE MADE FROM FINE CANADIAN RYE GRAINS.

Most things you eat or drink say what they're made of right on the package. That's because people like to know what they get good money for.

That goes for a bottle of whisky, a new kind of TV dinner, soft-serve, breakfast cereal — anything. We think people want to know what it's made of, how it's made, who makes it.

We think people are entitled to know these things. If the manufacturer is at all proud of his product, he won't hesitate to tell people about it.

Alberta Distillers Premium Rye Whisky, for instance.

That's what it says on the front label on the bottle: "Alberta Distillers Premium Rye Whisky - Bottled as Seed under the Supervision of the Canadian government. Alberta Distillers, Limited, Calgary, Canada."

Notice that it says Rye Whisky, not simply "Whisky."

It says "Rye" because not all Canadian whisky is distilled from rye grain. Much of it is distilled from corn, rye, wheat or barley or a combination of these grains.

Nothing wrong with making whisky from wheat. But Canadian whisky has a century-long heritage of Rye.

Light flavor — and this was achieved by distilling with rye grain. Alberta Distillers terms on this fine whisky tradition by making our brands with top quality Alberta grown rye grain.

That's why our whiskies are Rye Whiskies, and we're proud to say so.

Now look at the back label of the Alberta Distillers Premium Rye bottle. It says: "This is Alberta Premium Rye Whisky because it is black distilled with pure grain water from the Green Alliance grown rye grain and is aged, exclusively, in Calgary in the high, dry air of the Rocky Mountains. Only ADL whiskeys offer this smooth, light, good taste that comes from the combination of better's ingredients and elements with old fashioned care and craftsmanship."

Yes, it certainly would be helpful if everything said just nothing to the imagination about the way it was made, and from what ingredients.

That's why you can be sure of fine rye flavor and fine rye taste in the true Canadian whisky tradition when you buy our Premium Rye Whisky.

comment/ church's teaching. Many more today view social activism and respect the rights of the countries they work in. We must not miss the other message coming from our visitors, such as how to play hockey and football. In all things we aim to cooperate with them, consistent with Christian principles.

FEINBERG: A significant development has taken place recently in the calendar. Some rabbis would like to move the early Jewish missionary work. The Jewish missionary movement was quiet during most of the time of Judaism, who made a parable by death only to apostatize Christians or to become a convert to Judaism. Personally, I don't believe missionaries to the Gentiles would be a grave mistake. I would like to convert Jews to Judaism first.

FEINBERG: The very idea of spreading the gospel to others seems to be the premise that you have the key to salvation. Jewish missionary is not central to the fabric of Jewish belief. Once you try to persuade people to join your faith, you work a lie. You must first convince yourself that what you have to offer is better. I'm not sure this is healthy. I am sure the others would disagree with you. Doesn't each of you feel that you have the answer?

FEINBERG: Well, I wouldn't say that I have the answer. In the sense that no one else has any answer. Nobody has full and exclusive knowledge of the truth of God — not Roman Catholics nor Jew nor Protestant. All sorts of people who are seeking Christ are the best evidence and the best proof of the good and beautiful nature of man. When I remember Jesus, possible of the Last Judgment. I think that some of them may be, more purified than many Christians who say "Lord, Lord." The Buddha is the person who is taking money to educate Buddhist monks to come to Europe to work the good of people. Because they think we Muslims are working people. Well, even though I could not be one of them, I am going for the Buddha.

FEINBERG: Christianity is historical in origin. Its basis on the personality of Christ, Buddha and Jesus represent more of a philosophy. They speak to a variety of questions, while the heart of Christianity is the Person of Christ. He is the central character in the history of civilization. The form of our spiritual faith. We are founded on them, not on part of them. As Pope Pius XII said, "Specially we are Catholics."

FEINBERG: I would agree with Father Feinberg on that, although I think that the center of Christianity is not acceptance of a given philosophy, but rather devotion to a spiritual ideal. The devotion is a conviction which is Christian in spirit, whether he be a St. Francis Xavier, a Jesus Christ, a Longinus or a General Booth.

FEINBERG: Is it possible for a non-Christian — say a Buddhist or a Moslem — to go to heaven? Do all non-Christians go to hell?

FEINBERG: That is an appealing idea. This idea, people may hold it, but have not yet seen people think that God has a little group who are going to eternal bliss while all the rest are going to eternal damnation?

FEINBERG: Heaven is primarily the residence of being in intimate communion of the divine family of God's family. We naturally move to become members of the human family and then the family of heaven. I think it is and that is why people change their representation to become more and more part of the human family and the divine family. These two families operate together in our daily life.

FEINBERG: Judaism believes in immortality but its map of heaven is very vague. We don't have a blueprint of the eternal abode.

FEINBERG: We never pay too much attention to the geography of heaven although we firmly believe in a future existence. Nevertheless, my own philosophy — and I think it is in keeping with the core idea of Judaism — is our world is a time. I am willing to leave my destiny beyond the grave to God because I am sure he would not ignore me, or a Buddhist or an unbeliever, if the power of the beyond because I don't belong to a certain church.

FEINBERG: We would say that both worlds exist simultaneously. There is a good deal of attention being paid now to the writings of Teilhard de Chardin and to look The Phenomenon of Man. This book indicates how these two worlds can be joined and interpreted each other. We are moving toward a more intimate spiritual life. Continued on page 28

And we had, at the same time, the most miserable Christmas dinner of any year.

Orleans is now a Christmas world. It is war, and still is, as magnificent Indian legend.

It had an old story of a native for every house and a hundred more. This merged with a new idea on the first of the year in the south. There was need to visit it, although it is halfway up the Atlantic coast and in an

However, Grims considered the road lead to the north and Vashon. Remained by his and a deep tunnel, it seemed equally impossible. The old governor was only five leaders while with the air through The Desert, occupied to defend it.

or more than counter-clockwise as it way toward the right, and with less of momentum it took toward the left — so it was. Therein with its handle pointing slightly to the left of the center the mass develops a clockwise rotation and tends to the right — an outcome.

The same applies — "but" — when you position it the wrong way of the risk and "give the risk" to his advantage — that is, he indicates with his throw where the risk should not. Until he throws his own's final decision he is quarterback master and absolute authority. The risk is the last change," says Dagg. "On my risk there are no alternatives or changing during play. And I don't change my mind either — if I give someone the wrong risk I know about it without anyone telling me."

The risk varies his risk depending on the rest of the game. By putting an opponent's risk back (the same means the entire risk) he knows, then planning the throw a then edge down on the risk. He might call it a "take-out" — a then risk back with both his own and his opponent's risk outside the scoring range. Or the strategy of the moment might suggest a "with and off" shot in which he calls a risk against just the opponent's risk covering position. Or he could call for a defense "bump" — the thrower must make his risk against an opponent's, putting it in scoring position and forcing opponents to pick off. Or the risk might risk for one of the most difficult shots of all: a risk given to prevent his own team's shot-risk then being blocked out by the opponent.

"Even if the player is in his position," says Dagg, "a risk should call for the correct shot not the very shot. No matter how many times he repeats, a risk should play the game as it's given to be played or he'll never get any better."

Surprising, Dagg believes, is thirty percent of the game. Thirty-two players — not consistently two — accompany a team's risk down the ice lying in wait there because is motivated by the risk. There's more," he'll tell you, when he knows that the throw risk needs more speed to reach its intended destination. Grouping at front of the risk has the double effect of adding the rest of momentum and making the riskier stickier. In work long, keeping the risk from the opponent with such blocking hands. It is so as each, requiring short, brief, rhythmic strokes.

Dagg himself is an uncompromising perfectionist in every aspect of skating. He didn't risk up the game until age eight in 1938 when his brother got risk and he brother asked Leidi to fill in on the family risk for a moment because "I played mostly myself." Dagg says now, but I was hooked. Since that night he has worked steadily to perfect his skating style.

He announced that on developing his delivery. Gradually he smoothed his backswing and threw into a single rhythmic flow and straight as a long slide. "Two ways I began to try to work about his risk," Dagg says. "They think there is a risk like the follow-through in golf. It's the risk of a good delivery motion, not the motion for it." Dagg spent a couple of hours there in four years in work looking down the ice and he reached the point where he could consistently drive seven out of ten risks inside the usual four-foot range.

As Dagg grew gradually improved, he began entering in many competitors to his risk, making to the end for risk of his own hands on weekends. "We'd go anywhere within driving distance," Dagg says. "Sometimes I'd play Friday nights with my family in a Vancouver spot; then we'd risk off at midnight and drive all night to a house in the interior. We'd grab a couple of hours sleep and get out on the ice in the morning. It was fun when we were kids and we risk the drive back home seemed very long."

It was during one of those long drives back to Vancouver that Dagg made up his mind he'd put together a risk that would go all the way to the Moosehead River Championship. In October 1960 he told himself that if he didn't make the Bear in two years he was quitting the game — it was taking too much time from his family and business life.

He plan to a couple of assistant behind schedule. For three years, he experimented with teammates to a effort to build a risk strong at all positions. But he failed to win the B. C. championship. Sometimes his risk would win in the repeat Premier event play-downs, other years he took the Pacific coast championship only to lose in the B. C. final in a risk from the interior. "It was frustrating," says Dagg. "The toughest thing in the world is to not throw close but never make it. You can't keep a risk together if you always lose the important game."

Early this year, Dagg decided to take a risk which is the championship. This time he made it in March he had his risk, as B. C. representative, to the Moosehead River in Charlottetown. Though he was given only a slim chance of victory by the final day of the round robin competition, Dagg needed only to beat the F.B.I. risk in which the championship. A loss would have forced a play-off between B. C. and Saskatchewan. Going into the eighth out, the B. C. risk was down to F.B.I. 3-2. But Dagg brought them back into contention with a superb shot — a risk in turn that knocked out the F.B.I. shooter and gave against the Bear all a second F.B.I. risk. That shot linked the score and enabled the B. C. risk to win in the next out — it's a team sport and the risk has to draw the last risk in a crucial situation, says Dagg. "That's all the pressure on one risk."

A week later, Dagg's risk traveled to Calgary to represent Canada in the Scotch Cup World Championship and brought Canada its sixth world championship in a row.

The aggressive professional approach that took Dagg to his title has brought him a share of criticism. After almost every big tournament, he gets two or three anonymous letters or critical phone calls warning him of being arrogant and conceited. The criticism is unfair, in his mind. It is not going to change his attitude in competitive marking. Critics had themselves when they pretend that nothing is different from other sports, Dagg says. "They say that it doesn't matter whether you win or lose in marking, but all they're doing is giving themselves a risk for losing. I lose hard. I have to lose. I wouldn't regret the game if it meant I was competitive."

Dagg feels that anyone who is really serious about curling should practice hard and play in as many tournaments as he can against it. "You don't have to be a risk to enjoy the competition in curling," he says. "There's nothing wrong with being a first class team member who throws first. Some curlers would do better to play lead all the time. I'd rather be a leadhead lead on a good risk than a mediocre skip on a bad risk."

Dagg is uncertain about his own curling future. Provided by job — he's developer of marketing operations for Crown Zellerbach Canada Ltd. — permits, and he with Shirley have no serious objection over the prospect of spending another winter in an icy wilderness. Dagg and his risk will be out a second time in 1965. Last polar physics conference isn't expected to quit when they are ahead. "But they'll all be out to get on the year," he says. "I think we'll be lucky even to win the club championship."

Like a nation's football or hockey pro, Dagg is taking modern means of what rest — or sport — his declining years. "I take some kind of physical training in the off-season, I use probably my work with competitive curling for another three or four years," he says. After that, he'll return to the game's less competitive world of social curling — if he can stand the quiet. ★

Dagg's curling style is as distinctive as it is effective. Instead of sweeping the stone from the conventional position, he jumps forward with both hands curled right together (1). He throws the left hand directly behind his right (2) rather than to the side and holds the broom in his left hand as an aid (3). His most often preferred delivery angle is his body (4). With the center of gravity closer to the ice than most curlers (5), he often generally with his elbow in a crouched style, the broom barely touches the ice only after he's released the stone (5) — goes on time to stop him from missing the bag line.

Nobody ever gives Grand Reserve to anybody.

At Christmas time, people like to give expensive whisky like Chivas Regal Scotch and Crown Royal to their friends.

Whisky with an expensive price tag impresses people. Grand Reserve's price wouldn't impress anybody except somebody who was looking for a bargain.

Then, sad truth is that Grand Reserve doesn't cost enough.

The happy truth is that it has a very expensive taste. It's made at a very special way in a rare old distillery (Nobody in North America has one like it).

Our distillers cut the finest, takes off the rough edges, and leaves a light, clean taste. Maybe you should give your friends Grand Reserve this Christmas, and watch their reactions. You'll know if they're really your friends. And if they love my taste.
